2. Shifting the focus from the individual to the system – The second shift in the research agenda is to move away from the individual level and focus on the system level. This shift is necessary because the individual level of analysis is limited in its ability to capture the complexity of the system. The system level of analysis, on the other hand, allows researchers to explore the interactions between different components of the system and how these interactions shape the overall system behavior. This shift is reflected in the research agenda by the inclusion of topics such as "Systemic factors in the development of mental health problems" and "The role of the environment in the development of mental health problems".
