

ELLA FITZGERALD sings the DUKE ELLINGTON Songbook

The BEST of the SMALL GROUP SESSIONS

Duke Ellington and Ella Fitzgerald's paths had surely crossed many times during the Thirties, Forties, and early Fifties (and there is that beautiful Norman Leonard picture of Duke and Benny Goodman listening to Ella sing at the Downbeat club in New York in 1949). However, no recorded trace of the two legendary musicians collaborating together exists until 1957, when they participated on a series of big band sessions for Norman Grant. Although Ellington admired Ella, he was on a tight concert schedule by this point and didn't have a lot of free time for composing new music or making specific arrangements for these albums, which were going to be inscribed in the "songbook" formula that had proven so successful for Ella so far. As Stuart Nicholson wrote in his biography of Ella: "While the Rodgers & Hart Songbook was being completed in early September, Grant began putting plans in place to record a Duke Ellington Songbook. But getting Duke himself into the studios to complete the sessions proved difficult; his busy schedule seemed unending, and it was not until the end of June 1957 that Grant secured him and his orchestra for four days. Meanwhile, Jimmy Jones was sent out to get Ella's keys so that Duke could prepare special arrangements for the session. It was to no avail, however; when Duke arrived in the studios, he had nothing prepared. 'It was a panic scene', said Ella, 'with Duke almost making up the arrangements as we went along. Duke is a genius, I admire him as much as anyone in the world, but doing it that way, even though it was fun at times, got to be kind of nerve-racking.' Consequently, the Duke Ellington Songbook has a scissors-and-paste feel. 'It was done under the worst conditions', said Norman Grant in 1979. 'He was under contract to Columbia, but I had Johnny Hodges. When Hodges rejoined the band in 1956, I managed to force a few concessions, I would have Duke for one LP, two if I used Ella. We planned far in advance, but in the end Duke failed to do a single arrangement. Ella had to use the band's regular arrangements. She'd do a vocal where an instrumental chorus would normally go. To stretch to four LPs, we padded it with various small-group things with Ben Webster and so on.' The songs heard here come from those small group dates. To give them a more definite Ellingtonian sound, tenor saxophonist Ben Webster was called. A highly reputed soloist who was no longer a member of Duke's band by this point, Webster would remain forever close to both Ellington and his music. Legendary violinist Stuff Smith was added to one of the sessions (this is the only existing testimony of Smith and Ella playing together with the sole exception of two tunes captured by radio devices in Stockholm on April 29 of 1957, the same year the Ellington songbook was made). The small groups were completed with other stars under contract with Grant; Ella's regular accompanist Paul Smith and Grant's omnipresent star Oscar Peterson shared the piano, while Barney Kessel and Herb Ellis took turns on guitar.
