I-Shou University, Taiwan

Abstract

This study aims to create a corpus of General English (GE) reading textbooks used in universities in Taiwan to form the basis of an analysis. The operational measures for comparison involved vocabulary size, vocabulary levels (distribution among the British National Corpus 1st–14th 1,000 high-frequency word families) and text coverage. Coulhead's (2000) Academic Word List (AWL) containing 750 word families was chosen as one of the base word lists. In addition, the Grades 1–9 Curriculum 2,000 basic English words required by Taiwan's Ministry of Education as well as the elementary and intermediate vocabulary covered in the General English Proficiency Test (GEPT) were itemized into word families, and then added to the base words, the BNC high-frequency word lists and the AWL established in Nation's (2001) R-LANCE (n.d.) software. The GEPT is the accredited English proficiency test in Taiwan that college students are likely to encounter as an English graduation benchmark and the language requirement for the job market. The results show that a GE textbook can contribute to learning 40–41% interdisciplinary academic words. Beyond the 2,000-word level, a GE textbook can supply students with 162–2,001 new word families. It may be useful in preparing learners for an intermediate GEPT by covering 24.55% to 45% of the vocabulary involved in the test. It is hoped that the indices examined in this study would help English teachers to take into account vocabulary size and levels in curriculum design.

1. Introduction

English education in Taiwan starts officially in the third year of elementary school, though some private schools may begin English programs as early as in the first grade. During primary and secondary education (Grades 1–12), English courses aim to familiarize learners with basic English sentence structures and the most commonly used words. The content of English texts is broadly humanities-based and teaching is geared towards the general interest of students rather than to specific purposes.

The 2,000 basic English word list was published by Taiwan's Ministry of Education in 2003. It was developed based on the program design used by high schools in Taiwan, Korea, Japan and Shanghai as well as West's (1953) General Service List (GSL) of English words. Since then, the 2,000 basic English word list has served as a curricular standard for the English course design for elementary and high schools as well as even schools. By and large, the 2,000 lexical items are presumed to be the minimum vocabulary of EFL high school graduates entering university.

At the tertiary level, English is a required language subject. English courses for general purposes are offered to non-English majors two to three hours per week in the freshman and sophomore years respectively. In recent years, one widely implemented core educational policy in college English instruction was the adoption of English proficiency as a graduation requirement. This has provoked heated debate about the impact of English proficiency benchmarks on college English curricula. Some college English teachers speculate that test-oriented graduation benchmarks of
