Urquhart,2022 This paper establishes a rigorous framework for sentiment analysis applications in finance First we present a thorough review of the latest academic literature including both methodological advancements and findings Second we categorise and analyse the different sentiment analysis techniques from lexicon based approaches to machine learning and the latest powerful Bidirectional Encoder Representations from Transformers BERT models Third we conduct an empirical evaluation of the performance of 31 different sentiment analysis methods based on a sample of 20 000 Glassdoor company reviews using a variety of different metrics and across seven different experimental settings We show that BERT models perform the best followed by the machine learning models although here there is considerable variance between the different word embeddings and classifiers and lastly the lexicon based approaches The experiments also show that all models perform best when assessing the sentiment of positive or negative statements or distinguishing between one and five star reviews but more caution must be employed when including more ambiguous cases two star and four star reviews or using a multi class sentiment division positive negative or neutral rather than binary The majority of previous analysis of sentiment from Glassdoor reviews has focused on the star ratings but our findings suggest that analysis of the sentiment of textual comments may add further nuance
