

The Kidneys

On either side of your spine, you have a pair of bean-shaped organs called the kidneys. They are about 5 inches long and 3 inches wide, roughly the same size as a computer mouse or your fist.

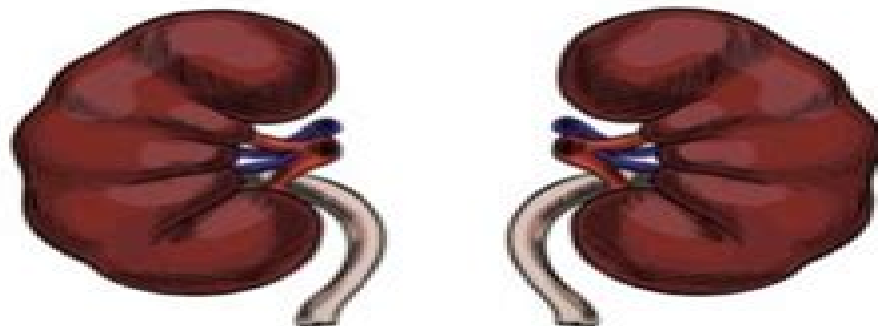

The kidneys help your body filter out waste and extra fluid. Not only do they make urine (pee), but they also help balance salt and water levels in the body and make hormones to help control blood pressure, keep your bones healthy, and help to make red blood cells.

The most important job is to filter out liquid waste from the blood to make urine which is why they are part of the urinary system.

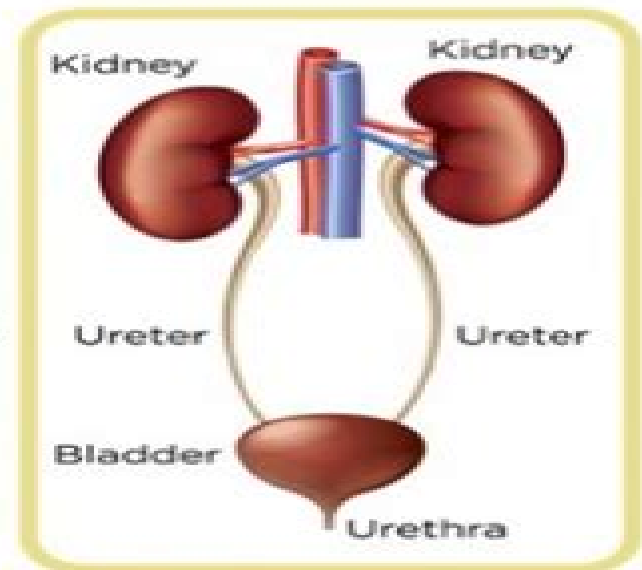

Inside each kidney are millions of tiny structures called nephrons. When your blood delivers nutrients around the body, chemical reactions occur in the cells when they process the nutrients, and waste is a by-product. The nephrons help to filter out that waste. Nephrons are what filters blood. They remove the waste products so muscles and organs can work properly.

How does it work?

Blood is carried to the kidneys by the renal artery, where it gets continually filtered. You have about 1 – 1 ½ gallons of blood in your body, and it is filtered through the kidneys about 40 times a day – wow! The waste that is collected mixes with water to make urine. The urine then goes down a long tube called the ureter and collects in the bladder. When the bladder gets about half full, it pings your brain that you need to use the restroom. When you urinate, the urine moves from the bladder down another tube called the urethra and into the toilet.

The kidneys also help to balance chemicals in your body like sodium, potassium, and calcium. They do this by controlling the volume of fluid in the body. If there is too much sodium, potassium, or calcium, it can be harmful to other organs in the body. The kidneys help keep homeostasis (balance) by communicating with the brain. Depending on how much water you drink, the brain sends out a hormone to hold on to fluid or let go of it.
