It is important to note that the authors' argument of generalizing from their Chinese culture is limited and often is dismissed as ethnocentric. It is often pointed out that judgments about the "best" teaching methods will always be culture-specific. However, if the authors' intention is to contribute to the field, it is more important to provide strong evidence that it is not culture, it is education that matters. If they had done that, they would have made a valuable contribution to the field. Instead, they have made a weak point. It is important to note that a teacher's role is often very different from the role of a teacher in a Western culture. In a Western culture, the teacher is often seen as a facilitator, while in a Chinese culture, the teacher is often seen as a guide. This is not to say that the Chinese teacher is better than the Western teacher, but it is to say that the Chinese teacher has a different role. This is a key point that the authors have not made. It is important to note that the authors' argument is based on a very limited sample of Chinese teachers. It is not clear how many teachers they interviewed, and it is not clear how they selected them. This is a major weakness of the study. It is important to note that the authors' argument is based on a very limited sample of Chinese teachers. It is not clear how many teachers they interviewed, and it is not clear how they selected them. This is a major weakness of the study.
