

Barthes' Invitation to Urban Semiology

Friday was the day of meeting Roland Barthes. Before encountered only through some poor translations of his French manuscripts, today he came closer in a friendly presence. The first was of course the Eiffel's Tower, who he gently describes (as quoted in AA files, 2/2012) as the one element he has in common with all his Paris friends. Indeed, it is everywhere.

Following was the close reading of "Semiology and the Urban" found in Rethinking Architecture: A Reader in Cultural Theory, by Neil Leach. (1997). Amazingly, for the first time Barthes appeared clear, straight to the point, and also somewhere on the common ground.

In his text he makes an approach to convince, or better invite, planners and architects to take a look on the possibilities of converging the spheres of semiology and urban thinking. It might be the describing of himself as an amateur of semiology that makes the text so open and frankly inviting.

After an overview of the current state of semiology, its possible application to urban planning is analysed. The latter criticized for the flattering of the city informative layers into a set of similarly assessed elements, while instead the city shall be constituted by strong and neutral elements, the "marked and unmarked". Hence, signification is standing in opposition to objective (quantified) data, such as maps.

Barthes' invitation comes from his promise of making a scientific leap forward, once the speaking of the language of the city is conceived without the metaphoric sense of language. In order to achieve that, three hints might be helpful:

- no more lexicons – distinction has to be made between the paradigmatic nature, and the (traditional) semantic dimension of the symbol. The words should be understood rather as dynamically contextualized signifying vehicles rather than self contained packages of meaning. This route may lead to the usage of the Metapolis Dictionary of Advanced Architecture,
- it is all of us who are the readers of the city and we have to learn its discourse. In-
