Force & Motion

We can classify how things move as being caused by one of two forces: a push or a pull. Brushing your hair is an example of a _____. Kicking a soccer ball is an example of a _____. The largest pulling force on our planet is _____, which constantly pulls toward the center of the Earth. It's easy to see its effects when we see objects fall. But did you know that gravity can be overcome? For example, if you hold a ball in your hand, it does not fall to the ground because you are using a pushing _____ upward, which is equal to the force that gravity is pulling down with. The ball stays in your hand because your pushing force and the force of gravity are the same, or _____ forces. If forces are _____, then we will see movement, like in a game of tug-of-war, when one team's pulling force is greater than that of the other team. If there is no _____, then the forces are balanced, or equal.

Force is measured in a unit called _____. The more force you apply, the more movement there will be. If you use the same force on two objects, the one with less _____ will move more. For example, flicking a ping pong ball and a golf ball with equal force will result in more movement of the ping pong ball because it has less mass. Another force, _____, acts on objects as well. This force resists movement. Surfaces that are _____ have less friction, while surfaces that are _____ have more.

Magnets also exert force and cause motion. If you join _____ poles, the magnets will _____, or push apart. If you join _____ poles, the magnets will _____, or pull together.
