ENHANCED OPTICAL CLEARING OF EX VIVO
PORCINE SKIN VIA HYPODERMIC NEEDLE
ARRAY DEVICES

Background: Optical clearing agents (OCAs) have shown promise for reducing scattering within the skin, and thus, enhancing access to underlying tissues and organs for laser-based therapeutics and diagnostics. However, realization of this promise has been constrained thus far by the hydrophobicity and viscosity of typical OCAs, which limits their penetration and diffusion within skin when applied topically. Herein, we report preliminary results from efforts seeking to overcome these limitations through development of hypodermic needle array (HNA) devices that will provide a simple and minimally-invasive means for actively perfusing OCAs rapidly and uniformly throughout the desired tissue volume.

Study Design/Materials and Method: HNA devices based on arrays of 30 gauge hypodermic needles were fabricated via 3D-printing. Using a syringe pump to control delivery rate and volume, a 70% glycerol solution (FDA-approved OCA) was administered through the devices to ex vivo porcine skin.

Clearing efficacy was characterized through measurement of light transmittance across the visible spectrum using a fiber optic spectrometer.

Results: Our preliminary results have shown that the HNA devices enhance transmittance up to 50% relative to topical administration of comparable OCA volumes. Current efforts are focused on developing better understanding of the delivery dynamics, and using this understanding to inform optimization of device design and delivery parameters to further improve clearing efficacy.

Conclusion: While further studies are required, our early results suggest that the HNA devices hold potential for significantly improving skin clearing efficacy, and thus, eventually broadening the indications for which laser-based therapeutics and diagnostics can be used. One key example in this regard lies in the in the Windows to the Brain concept, which seeks to couple transparent cranial implants with OCA-based scalp-clearing to provide new means optically accessing the brain on a chronically-recurring basis without need for recurring craniotomies or scalp retraction.

BIOCHEMICAL PERSPECTIVE OF FAT
PHYSIOLOGY AFTER APPLICATION OF HIFEM
FIELD TECHNOLOGY: ADDITIONAL
INVESTIGATION OF FAT DISRUPTION EFFECTS
IN A PORCINE STUDY

Yael Halaas, Jan Bernardy
*Facel Plastic and Reconstructive Surgery, New York, NY;
University of Life Sciences, Department of Veterinary Sciences,
Prague, Czech Republic*

Background: Multiple studies reported fat tissue reduction after application of the High-Intensity Focused Electromagnetic (HIFEM) technology, yet cellular level evidence of the exact mechanisms remains scarce. This study aims to verify or refute previous single-study histological evidence and further investigate the proposed mechanism of apoptosis induction.

Study Design/Materials and Method: The thighs of two large white pigs were treated with HIFEM for 30 minutes. Sub-cutaneous fat punch biopsies were collected from the application area before, immediately after and 8 hours post-treatment. Control samples were taken from the abdomen immediately after and 8 hours post-treatment. The samples were used for detection of pro-apoptotic DNA markers and for measurements of the level of free-fatty acids (FFA). A histopathologist examined the samples by electron microscopy. The pH levels of the fat tissue were also measured at the biopsy site.

Results: The levels of FFA in the treated fat tissue increased at both animals on average by 127.1% immediately post-treatment and by 134.1% eight hours post-treatment, indicating a rapid breakdown of lipids. In the same region, the average fat pH changed from 7.30 ± 0.12 at baseline to 6.60 ± 0.07 immediately post-treatment, and then to 7.19 ± 0.12 eight hours post-treatment. The levels of BAX, TXNIP, MMP9 and TNF α increased post-treatments; BAD levels remained constant. Apoptotic changes in adipocytes were confirmed by electron microscopy. Control samples showed constant levels of pH and pro-apoptotic markers. The FFA levels in the control samples increased by 41.6% and 51.4% immediately and eight hours post-treatment, respectively.

Conclusion: Through observation of the increase in pro-apoptotic markers, we managed to replicate the previously reported signs of elevated fat apoptosis induced by HIFEM. These effects were accompanied by increased FFA levels indicating a rapid lipolytic reaction, and by the reduced pH levels. Cell acidification has been shown by previous studies to be a preceding signal and one of the causes of cell apoptosis.
