

cavity closers are omitted or wrongly constructed baffles are omitted from joints
 the cavity is too wide

Water will fail to drain from the cavity if:
 drainage holes are too small drainage paths are blocked with debris
 the cavity is blocked with insulation material internal flashings and gutters are incorrectly fitted or missing drainage of components (windows and doors) is not linked with drainage of the rainscreen

- Site testing

Site testing may be carried out during construction to check for good workmanship and consistent performance. Testing may also be carried out after construction to identify the cause of water leakage.

The hose pipe test is used for routine site testing for water penetration. The test is described in CWCT 'Standard and guide to good practice for curtain walls'. A full description of site testing is given in CWCT TN10 'Site testing for watertightness'. Testing should be conducted using a standard nozzle, standard water pressure and motion of the nozzle.

The test was developed for use on sealed joints but it may be modified for use on opening joints. In this case it is good practice to vary the nozzle pressure and not the motion of the nozzle.

Air leakage

Air leakage can lead to excessive heating bills, an inability to heat a building and uncomfortable draughts.

Allowable air leakage rates are given in Part L of the Building Regulations.

High rates of air leakage are symptomatic of poor installation. Walls that leak too much air are also likely to leak water as poor air seals impair the pressure equalisation of many walls and components.

High rates of air leakage are associated with unintentional openings in the air barrier. These openings will impair the acoustic properties of the wall and allow more sound into the building.

The main causes of unintentional air leakage are:
 incorrectly fitted air seal gaskets
 failure to seal windows and other elements to the air barrier of the surrounding wall
 Opening windows and doors that are not correctly adjusted and do not seal correctly
