CHAPTER FOUR

Reliability

Reliability 85

"Reliability" refers to the consistency of scores obtained by the same persons when they are reexamined with the same test on different occasions, or with different sets of equivalent items, or under other variable examining conditions. This concept of reliability underlies the computation of the error likely to occur in a single individual's score as a result of irrelevant or irrelevant chance factors.

The concept of reliability has been used to cover several aspects of score consistency. In its broadest sense, test reliability indicates the extent to which individual differences in test scores are attributable to "true" differences in the characteristics under consideration and the extent to which they are attributable to chance errors. To put it in more technical terms, measures of test reliability make it possible to estimate what proportion of the total variance of test scores is error variance. There are two "errors" in the sense that they could be avoided or corrected through improved methodology. That error methodology has been introduced from one corner of psychology when interest centered on finding general laws of behavior and assessing individuals on what were assumed to be rigidly based underlying traits. Today, psychologists recognize unreliability as an intrinsic property of all behavior and seek to investigate and sort out the many sources of such unreliability.

With regard to score reliability, the core of the matter lies in the definition of error variance. Factors that might be considered error variance for one purpose would be classified under true variance for another. For example, if we are interested in measuring fluctuations of mood, then the day-by-day changes in scores on a test of cheerfulness-depression would be relevant to the purpose of the test and would hence be part of the true variance of the scores. If, on the other hand, the test is designed to measure more permanent personality characteristics, the same daily fluctuations would fall under the heading of error variance.

Essentially, any condition that is irrelevant to the purpose of the test represents error variance. Thus, when examiners try to maintain uniform testing conditions by controlling the testing environment, instructions, time limits, support, and other similar factors, they are reducing error variance and making the test scores more reliable. Despite optimum testing conditions, however, no test is a perfectly reliable instrument. Hence, every test should be accompanied by a statement of its reliability. Such a measure of reliability characterizes the test when it is administered under standard conditions and given to persons similar to those constituting the normative sample. The characteristics of this sample should therefore be specified, together with the type of reliability that was measured.

There could, of course, be as many sources of test unreliability as there are conditions affecting test scores, since any such conditions might be irrelevant for a certain purpose and would thus be classified as error variance. The types of reliability computed in actual practice, however, are relatively few. In this chapter, the principal techniques for measuring the reliability of test scores will be examined, together with the sources of error variance identified by each.¹

Since all types of reliability are concerned with the degree of consistency or agreement between two independently derived sets of scores, they can all be expressed in terms of a correlation coefficient. Accordingly, the next section will consider some of the basic characteristics of correlation coefficients, in order to clarify their use and interpretation. More technical discussions of correlations, as well as more detailed specifications of computing procedures, can be found in our elementary textbook of educational or psychological statistics, such as Harman and Huber (1991) or D. G. Howell (1997).

THE CORRELATION COEFFICIENT

Meaning of Correlation. Essentially, a correlation coefficient (r) expresses the degree of correspondence, or relationship, between two sets of scores. Thus, if the top-scoring individuals in the variable 1 also obtained the top scores in the second-best individual in variable 2, and so on down to the poorest individual in the group, then there would be a perfect correlation between variables 1 and 2. Such a correlation would have a value of ± 1.00 .

¹This approach to score reliability has sometimes been called a generalizability theory of reliability (see Bollen, 1989; Cronk & Harman, 1985; Cronbach, Glesne, Nunnally, & Portney, 1977; Port & Harman, 1989; Shavelson & Webb, 1985). This is not a sufficiently well-developed, however, because generalizability applies to all aspects of a test score and, in fact, to all events that it measures. The description of the reliability procedure is based on its identification of various components irrelevant to analysis.
