[illegible]

The image shows a page from a psychology textbook. At the top, the word 'Psychology' is partially visible. The main content is a diagram illustrating the cognitive-behavioral model. It consists of three interconnected boxes: 'Thoughts' (blue), 'Feelings' (green), and 'Behaviors' (red). Arrows indicate that these three components are interrelated and can influence each other. To the left of the diagram is a legend with three colored squares corresponding to the boxes: a blue square for 'Thoughts', a green square for 'Feelings', and a red square for 'Behaviors'. Below the legend, there is a paragraph of text explaining the model. The text states that 'Thoughts, Feelings, and Behaviors are all interconnected and can influence each other. For example, a negative thought can lead to negative feelings, which can lead to negative behaviors. Conversely, a positive behavior can lead to positive feelings, which can lead to positive thoughts.' The diagram is a simplified representation of this complex relationship.
