

some exercises on wave-particle duality in quantum mechanics along with their solutions

Exercise 1: Single Slit

Imagine you have an experimental setup that allows you to send individual electrons through a single slit. Calculate the probability of detecting an electron at a specific position on the detection screen behind the slit.

Solution 1:

In this case, you can consider each electron as an individual particle without interference. The probability of detecting an electron at a specific position on the screen is equal to 1 because each electron either goes through the slit or doesn't, without interference.

Exercise 2: Double Slit

Now, consider the double-slit experiment. If you send a beam of electrons through both slits, calculate the probability of detecting an electron at a specific position on the detection screen, assuming electrons behave as waves.

Solution 2:

In the double-slit experiment, electrons behave as waves and create an interference pattern on the detection screen. The probability of detecting an electron at a specific position depends on the interference pattern, which is a sinusoidal function. You can use interference equations to calculate the probability as a function of position on the screen.
