Acid. At each sample time three replicate cores of 1.5-cm diameter were crushed and extracted for 20 min in boiling distilled H_2O . The extracts were titrated to pH 8.0 with 0.01 N NaOH and their acid content expressed as $\mu\text{eq acid/g fresh weight}$. Samples taken in the field were frozen immediately in solid CO_2 —care being taken that the insulated box containing the samples was kept away from the experimental plant and downwind of it.

RESULTS AND DISCUSSION

Diurnal Measurements of Stomatal Resistance, CO_2 , and Acid. These parameters were measured in a large plant of A. deserti growing on Agave Hill in the Deep Canyon Desert Research Center. A different leaf was used for each set of samples. The plant accumulated acid at night and consumed it the following day (Fig. 1). In general, during the period of acid synthesis the internal gas phase CO_2 concentration was the same as that of ambient air or less. The analytical methods used did not permit accurate measurements to be made at CO_2 concentrations below about half that of ambient air. During acid consumption CO_2 concentration initially rose to around 0.8% (about 25 $\times$ ambient air concentration). As acid content approached its minimum level, as occurred toward the end of the day, CO_2 concentration also declined and eventually fell to the minimum detectable level. Stomatal resistance varied with CO_2 concentration being high when CO_2 level was high and low when CO_2 level was low. The transient decrease in resistance after 2 h darkness may have been caused by dew formation interfering with the function of the autopenometer. Similar experiments were performed with O. ficus-indica and substantially similar results were obtained except that maximum CO_2 concentrations in excess of 2% were observed.
