School Dropout

School dropout can be defined simply as any person who fails to earn a high school diploma. In practice, however, it can be a challenge to identify students who will drop out with precision. Dropouts have relatively high rates of mobility and school transfers can make graduation a difficult achievement to track. Additionally, studies of school dropout often begin with high school students, but dropout occurs in the middle grades too. Finally, some students “stopout” of school and then return or subsequently enroll in equivalency credential programs (e.g., earn a General Education Development (GED) certificate). This entry summarizes key points in understanding the prevalence, antecedents, and consequences of school dropout and efforts to prevent its occurrence.

In 2012, 6.6% the U.S. population (2.6 million people) were status dropouts. Historically, both measures show that dropout rates have declined. For example, in 1990, the status dropout rate in the U.S. was 12%. The decline is due,
