Implementing and Testing VLANs in Meshed Tree Protocol Ankush Kaul, 2020 Meshed Tree Protocol MTP 1.2 is being developed to overcome the performance challenges faced with older loop avoidance layer 2 protocols like Spanning Tree Protocol STP 3 and Rapid STP RSTP 5 which have high convergence time causing a significant delay during initial convergence and subsequent re-convergence in the event of topology change or link failure. This slow convergence is not suitable for the modern high speed and dynamic networks and is being addressed with better performing protocols like MTP which uses Meshed Tree Algorithm MTA to form multiple overlapping trees. 1. In this thesis we will implement Virtual Local Area Network VLAN 4 for MTP networks using the Global Environment for Network Innovation GENI 19 testbed. With the growing size and complexity of modern day networks it is essential to segment a larger network into isolated smaller sections which improve the security, reliability and efficiency of the network. This is achieved by using VLANs which act as separate smaller networks within a larger network. In this thesis we will discuss the working and benefits of VLANs in the current implementations of STP and how can VLANs be introduced in MTP along with a basic implementation of VLANs in the code developed for MTP by extending it to support Multi Meshed trees where each meshed tree would cover a VLAN.
