INTRODUCTION

Nurses constitute the greatest number of healthcare workers in the United States (US) and globally.^[1] Increasingly, the role they play in meeting societal demands for safe, evidence-informed, quality care is being recognized.^[2-4] Moreover, more evidence is being generated that supports the nurse's level of education makes a significant impact on patient outcomes.^[4-6] These investigators report that patient mortality decreases when the number of nurses prepared at the baccalaureate level increased. However, Felber et al., report contrary results when non-US educated nurses are employed in US hospitals except in instances when 'patient-to-nurse ratios are lower than average' (p. 366).^[4] Thus education may not be the only factor contributing to patient outcomes.

Nonetheless, despite increasing evidence, debate about what constitutes the most appropriate education for nurses continues in the US and elsewhere. In many countries, nurses continue to be educated by physicians, programmes of study are extremely short, and opportunities for continuing education are limited. In the US, an individual can choose one of three programmes for their initial education in nursing: Hospital-based, community college or 4-year college or university. The purposes of this article are to provide a brief overview of the evolution of nursing education, describe the current and projected state of nursing education, and discuss some pressing challenges that educators face as they strive to meet the charge to prepare nurses to care for more complex patients situated in ever-changing healthcare systems.

EVOLUTION OF NURSING EDUCATION

The past

Donahue^[78] in her illustrated history of nursing from ancient times, highlights times when the profession of nursing was either present or noticeably absent. While beyond the scope of this article, one must be cognizant of the impact societal changes have had on nursing education is critical to the discussion. Thus, issues such as disease, revolutions, and women's rights have helped drive the need for and education of nurses.

Although there are records of men and women nurses during early civilisations, most scholars consider the work done by Florence Nightingale connotes the birth of modern nursing. Her efforts had a profound impact on standards of nursing care^[11-12] and on the education
