Blanchflower, Andrew J. Oswald, Bert Van Landeghem, 2008 If human beings care about their relative weight a form of imitative obesity can emerge in which people subconsciously keep up with the weight of the Joneses Using Eurobarometer data on 29 countries this paper provides cross sectional evidence that overweight perceptions and dieting are influenced by a person's relative BMI and longitudinal evidence from the German Socioeconomic Panel that well being is influenced by relative BMI Highly educated people see themselves as fatter at any given actual weight than those with low education These results should be treated cautiously and fixed effects estimates are not always well determined but there are grounds to take seriously the possibility of socially contagious obesity and the Hand book of the American Economic Association Health Insurance on the Internet and the Economics of Search Mark V. Pauly,Bradley Herring,David Song,2002 This paper explores the level and dispersion of premiums paid for individual health insurance by comparing asking price data posted on an electronic insurance exchange with survey data on premiums actually paid in the period just before the advent of electronic exchanges The primary theoretical question is whether the pattern of differences between asking prices and transactions prices can be explained using a simple search theory We hypothesize following suggestions of Stigler and Rothschild that higher risks who expect to pay higher premiums for a given policy will engage in more intensive search than lower risks given the same distribution of asking prices As a result for a given distribution of asking prices the dispersion of premiums actually paid transactions prices will be smaller for higher risks Therefore the introduction of an electronic exchange should have a larger potential influence on the dispersion and level of premiums paid for lower risks than for higher risks We find evidence consistent with each of these hypotheses
