➤ TRANSLATION MEMORY MAINTENANCE

Maintaining your translation memories (TMs) can be necessary to keep your linguistic resources clean and efficient. You can, for example, find and replace terms and expressions, when the terminology used in the TM has become outdated and needs to be adapted to comply with new standards.

Editing Segment Content: Note that the TU background color has changed. Also, an Edited icon has appeared next to the TU.

Committed changes cannot be undone. Note that after committing the changes the original background color has been restored and the Edited icons next to the modified TUs have disappeared.

Ctrl+H: In a real-life scenario you may have to run two find/replace operations, i.e. one for lower-case search terms and another one for upper-case variants, as the search term might also occur at the beginning of a segment, which means that the initial letter would be in upper case.

Searching for potential duplicates: Potential duplicates are defined as TUs that have the same source segment and different target segments. Such TUs might not always be redundant, as some source segments require different translations depending on the context. This is why SDL Trados Studio refers to these TUs only as 'potential' duplicates.

TM exports: Backing up TMs to external files; Running a filtered export to create a new TM, which is a subset of the original TM (e.g. only TUs related to a particular customer or subject); Running a filtered export to provide another user with a subset of your TM.

- You can open a TM in the Translation Memories view. This will show the first 50 translation units (TUs) in a list.
- Source and/or target segments can be modified by editing the text. The corresponding TU will then be highlighted. The changes will only be applied when you commit them by clicking the corresponding button.
- You can also change the values of TM fields (if available)
- TUs can be marked for deletion. Deletions need to be committed and cannot be undone afterwards.
- You can run find/replace operations on the entire TM, e.g. to replace outdated terms.
