ABSTRACT The purpose of this study was to investigate the relationship between self efficacy and academic achievement for Hispanic Black and White students Self efficacy has been studied immensely related to performance and academic achievement However little focus has been placed on general academic achievement across the curriculum In this quantitative study the researcher sought to establish a correlation between academic achievement and self efficacy across racial gender and socioeconomic lines using non probabilistic sampling techniques and surveying Self efficacy was studied in the context of Bandura's and other self efficacy scholars theories and measured using the Morgan Jinks Student Efficacy Scale The results suggested a strong correlational relationship between self efficacy and academic achievement for Hispanic Black and White participants Analysis failed to produce significant results related to the relationship between gender socioeconomic status and self efficacy Additionally no significant differences were found in the proportion of low achieving and low self efficacy students across the three racial groups Results from this study may provide specific information to help teachers work with low achieving and low self efficacy students to increase academic achievement This study will hopefully inspire future studies to implement strategies aimed at increasing self efficacy and academic achievement as well studies incorporating other demographic groups
