

Closing the theory-practice gap: a model of nursing praxis

GARY ROLFE BSc, MA, RMN, PGCEA

Senior Lecturer, School of Health Studies, University of Portsmouth, Portsmouth, UK

Accepted for publication 18 December 1992

Summary

- Despite the efforts of nursing theorists, educationalists and practitioners, the theory-practice gap continues to defy resolution. This paper argues that only by reconsidering the relation between theory and practice can the gap be closed.
- Drawing upon ideas from teaching and other practice-based disciplines, including nursing, the article suggests that the current model of viewing theory as informing and controlling practice should give way to a mutually enhancing model in which theory is derived from practice, and in turn influences future practice.
- This coming together of theory and practice is referred to as nursing praxis, and suggests that informal theory should be unique to each individual encounter with each patient.
- The clinical nurse is thus not only a practitioner, but a theorist and researcher, who responds to patients not according to some grand, inflexible theory, but by the process of reflection-in-action, drawing upon their expertise and a repertoire of past experiences and encounters.

Keywords: theory-practice gap, nursing praxis, reflection in action.

Introduction

One of the most contentious and enduring problems in nursing is the observation that what happens in clinical situations rarely, if ever, matches what the textbooks say ought to happen. Most nurses will have had some experience of this so-called theory-practice gap, but it is probably felt most acutely by student nurses, who often find themselves torn between the demands of their tutors to implement what they have learnt in theory, and pressure from practising nurses to conform to the constraints of real life clinical situations. According to the theorists, the gap is between what research and theory says should ideally be happening, and what actually happens in the 'imperfect' clinical area. From this perspective, the gap will be reduced by nursing practice moving closer to theory. Yet according to the practitioners, the gap is between what theory says should happen and what actually works. From this perspective, the gap will be reduced by nursing theory more closely reflecting the realities of clinical life.

The fact that the gap is still with us, suggests that neither view is an accurate representation of the actual situation. This paper will argue that the gap is based on a misconception about the nature of nursing theory and the relationship of theory to practice. Furthermore, it will be argued, the gap is a necessary consequence of the way in which theory has developed over the years. It is a logical gap, predicated by a body of theory which can never fully account for what happens in clinical practice. As such, the
