

Military Dimensions of the Cold War: The Arms Race

This section deals with the military dimensions of the Cold War. More specifically, it covers one of the most important military dimensions that had an impact around the world, namely the Cold War's arms race. An arms race is a competition between two or more nations in which they build up their militaries in an attempt to have the largest, best equipped military.

The Arms Race in the Early Cold War

How did the Cold War create an arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union?

What sorts of new concepts and strategies came about in the early Cold War because both sides had nuclear weapons?

The Cold War was a contest for the hearts and minds of all humanity. Both the United States and its allies on one side and the Soviet Union and its allies on the other side believed that their respective systems were the best. Cold War competition took place across the entire gamut of human endeavor. Culturally, the liberal democracies in the West and the Communists in the East believed their respective societies created a happier human being and promoted a better way of life. Economically, both capitalism and communism vied to become the most efficient and to best satisfy consumer demands. Was capitalism the best way to organize one's economy? Or was centrally planned communism superior? These were questions asked during the Cold War.

Politically both sides are continually pursuing allies, prospective allies across the globe. Even in sports, the Soviets and Americans competed every four years in the Olympics Games. In fact, international sports competitions were an important part of the Cold War. To give one example, in chess, American
