

1 Stored Procedures in PL/SQL

Many modern databases support a more procedural approach to databases. They allow you to write procedural code to work with data. Usually, it takes the form of SQL statements with the more familiar IF statements, etc.

Now that this has nothing to do with accessing the database, you can access any database from virtually any language. What we're talking about is the code that is provided by the database vendor.

While there are many various "database" languages, we will only talk about the primary ones: T-SQL, which is supported by SQL Server and Sybase, and PL/SQL, which is supported by Oracle.

Many other languages must be supported. For example, Oracle offers you the ability to call procedures and triggers in Java, etc.

2 PL/SQL

Mostly when people mention SQL, Oracle supports PL/SQL. The PL stands for Procedural Language, which means you can have things like IF statements, loops, subroutines, and other procedural things along with declarative SQL statements. PL/SQL.

2.1 Variables

Just as most procedural languages, PL/SQL has some sort of variables. The typical notation for plain SQL indicates types that must be followed. You can declare for a type of a particular column explicitly by specifying the fully qualified column name (tablename.columnname) followed by TYPE. For example: `PRODUCT.PRICEINTYPE`.

Similarly, we can refer to a particular row as a single type. Again, you declare it by referring to a database table column: `PRODUCT.PRICETYPE`. This would refer to a single column stored in the PRODUCT table.

Along with the above mentioned, some column types are: `NUMBER`, `DATE`, `NUMBER`, `CHAR`, and `VARCHAR`.

We declare variables of these type usually by specifying column in table. First, we put the name of the variable, then the type we want to be have. For example, to declare a price variable of a food price NUMBER, we might do something like this:

PRICE NUMBER(5);
```

2.2 PL/SQL Program Blocks

PL/SQL programs are structured in blocks and have the following format:

```
DECLARE
    variable_declaration
    procedural_code
```
