

1.0 INTRODUCTION

Thin sheet steel products are extensively used in building industry, and range from purlins to roof sheeting and floor decking. Generally these are available for use as basic building elements for assembly at site or as prefabricated frames or panels. These thin steel sections are cold-formed, i.e. their manufacturing process involves forming steel sections in a cold state (i.e. without application of heat) from steel sheets of uniform thickness. These are given the generic title Cold Formed Steel Sections. Sometimes they are also called Light Gauge Steel Sections or Cold Rolled Steel Sections. The thickness of steel sheet used in cold formed construction is usually 1 to 3 mm. Much thicker material up to 8 mm can be formed if pre-galvanised material is not required for the particular application. The method of manufacturing is important as it differentiates these products from hot rolled steel sections. Normally, the yield strength of steel sheets used in cold-formed sections is at least 280 N/mm^2 , although there is a trend to use steels of higher strengths, and sometimes as low as 230 N/mm^2 .

Manufacturers of cold formed steel sections purchase steel coils of 1.0 to 1.25 m width, slit them longitudinally to the correct width appropriate to the section required and then feed them into a series of roll forms. These rolls, containing male and female dies, are arranged in pairs, moving in opposite direction so that as the sheet is fed through them its shape is gradually altered to the required profile. The number of pairs of rolls (called stages) depends on the complexity of the cross sectional shape and varies from 5 to 15. At the end of the rolling stage a flying shearing machine cuts the member into the desired lengths.

An alternative method of forming is by press - braking which is limited to short lengths of around 6 m and for relatively simple shapes. In this process short lengths of strip are pressed between a male and a female die to fabricate, one fold at a time and obtain the final required shape of the section. Cold rolling is used when large volume of long products are required and press breaking is used when small volume of short length products are produced.

Galvanizing (or zinc coating) of the preformed coil provides very satisfactory protection against corrosion in internal environments. A coating of 275 g/m^2 (total for both faces) is the usual standard for internal environments. This corresponds to zinc coating of 0.04 mm. Thicker coatings are essential when moisture is present for long periods of time. Other than galvanising, different methods of pre-rolling and post-rolling corrosion protection measures are also used.
