

edge is not in the residual graph. In the first case, we clearly need to relabel v before applying a push on this edge. In the latter case, one needs to apply push to the reverse edge (w, v) to make (v, w) reenter the residual graph. However, when we apply push to edge (w, v) , then w is above v , and so v needs to be relabeled before one can push flow from v to w again. ■

Since edges do not have to be considered again for push before relabeling, we get the following.

(7.32) When the $\text{current}(v)$ pointer reaches the end of the edge list for v , the relabel operation can be applied to node v .

After relabeling node v , we reset $\text{current}(v)$ to the first edge on the list and start considering edges again in the order they appear on v 's list.

(7.33) The running time of the Preflow-Push Algorithm, implemented using the above data structures, is $O(mn)$ plus $O(1)$ for each nonsaturating push operation. In particular, the generic Preflow-Push Algorithm runs in $O(n^2m)$ time, while the version where we always select the node at maximum height runs in $O(n^3)$ time.

Proof. The initial flow and relabeling is set up in $O(m)$ time. Both push and relabel operations can be implemented in $O(1)$ time, once the operation has been selected. Consider a node v . We know that v can be relabeled at most $2n$ times throughout the algorithm. We will consider the total time the algorithm spends on finding the right edge on which to push flow out of node v , between two times that node v gets relabeled. If node v has d_v adjacent edges, then by (7.32) we spend $O(d_v)$ time on advancing the $\text{current}(v)$ pointer between consecutive relabelings of v . Thus the total time spent on advancing the current pointers throughout the algorithm is $O(\sum_{v \in V} nd_v) = O(mn)$, as claimed. ■

7.5 A First Application: The Bipartite Matching Problem

Having developed a set of powerful algorithms for the Maximum-Flow Problem, we now turn to the task of developing applications of maximum flows and minimum cuts in graphs. We begin with two very basic applications. First, in this section, we discuss the Bipartite Matching Problem mentioned at the beginning of this chapter. In the next section, we discuss the more general Disjoint Paths Problem.
