Introduction: Anesthesia plays a critical role in modern surgical procedures by ensuring patient pain management and safety. This study aimed to investigate the knowledge and attitude of surgical patients and their families toward anesthesia.

Methods: This prospective, cross-sectional study included patients and their families in Wenzhou, China. Data collection and the measurement of knowledge and attitude scores were administered using a self-administered questionnaire.

Results: 503 participants (69.98% patients, 30.02% families) were included. The mean knowledge and attitude scores were 7.93 ± 6.11 (possible range: 0–26), and 32.64 ± 2.59 (possible range: 8–40), respectively, indicating an inadequate knowledge and positive attitude. Moreover, a multivariable logistic regression analysis showed that age [odd ratio (OR) = 0.394, $p = 0.018$], residence (OR = 0.424, $p = 0.002$), household income per month (OR = 0.297 – 0.380, $p < 0.05$), gender (OR = 1.680, $p = 0.017$), education (OR = 2.891, $p = 0.017$), and experienced anesthesia (OR = 4.405, $p = 0.001$) were independently associated with knowledge score. Additionally, knowledge score (OR = 1.096, $p < 0.001$), relationship with the patient (OR = 1.902, $p = 0.009$), and household income per month (OR = 0.545, $p < 0.031$) were independently associated with attitude score.

Discussion: In conclusion, surgical patients and their families in Wenzhou, China had inadequate knowledge while positive attitude towards anesthesia, which might be influenced by their sociodemographic characteristics, including age, gender, residence, education, household income, relationship with patient, and experienced anesthesia. These findings emphasize the necessity of customized educational programs aimed at improving anesthesia knowledge and attitudes of patients and their families, especially among those with older age and lower socioeconomic status.

KEYWORDS

knowledge, attitude, anesthesia, surgical patients and their families, cross-sectional study

1 Introduction

Major surgeries, numbering over 300 million annually (1), rely heavily on anesthesia to ensure patient comfort, pain management, and safety (2). This involves the administration of medication to induce a controlled state of unconsciousness, eliminate pain sensations, and maintain physiological stability throughout the surgical procedure (3). Successful outcomes hinge not only on the expertise of anesthesia providers but also on patient and family cooperation, necessitating adherence to pre-anesthesia instructions and family support (4).
