Despite the fact some Neolithic communities grew to considerable sizes they are typically not considered when people think of the first ancient civilizations or the first major cities so when German archaeologists discovered the archaeological site of Göbekli Tepe in southeastern Turkey in the 1990s it created an academic firestorm that is still raging Far from being just another settlement Göbekli Tepe has been described as the world's first temple and perhaps one of the locations where human civilization began Subsequent archaeological work at Göbekli Tepe has revealed that the site was a spiritual center for the local population during a time when humans were undergoing a transition as hunter gatherers in the Paleolithic Period to a more sedentary lifestyle in the Neolithic Period more than 10 000 years ago Further research in the disciplines of anthropology religion and history indicate that the activity at Göbekli Tepe subsequently set the tone for elements of Neolithic and Bronze Age religion and ideology in the Near East especially in Anatolia roughly equivalent with modern Turkey Although many elements of Göbekli Tepe's history remain an enigma and probably will in the future due to the nature of the source material the relatively recent work at the site has helped historians speculate about how Near Eastern people lived in the Mesolithic Period how those lifestyles evolved and how they contributed to the history of the era
