

Economic Growth and the Determinants of Productive Capacity

The three policy instruments – subsidies to produce and process, and incentives to enter the exporting and supply of the three products – are consistent with the policy goals. It also gives structural reformers, a robust production capacity, since the limited food processing and marketing infrastructure is developed. It is possible for producers to export and sell their products internationally. In addition, the subsidies could be the source of the production resources.

As summarized in Table 1, the authors can be classified in several different ways. Some authors emphasize the physical or biological changes that occur in humans, change in behavior, other functions that are specific to the particular process or technology. Sometimes, however, it is more difficult to identify and measure how one has impacted these specific outcomes.

For production-oriented growth to actually be useful for development and for the welfare of the population, growth must be capital growth. Growth in production per worker is not sufficient for improved living standards. The natural resource growth is also very important. It is important to have a high rate of growth in the natural resource base. It is important to have a high rate of growth in the natural resource base.
