

Juhani Pallasmaa's essay was initially a lecture given at a conference on Nordic tradition in Copenhagen organized by the magazine Studio in March, 1988. In preparing his essay for this volume he commented: "The themes of my paper were raised by the evident loss of the sense of place and cultural specificity projected by processes of globalization and commodification." Like the proponents of critical regionalism, Pallasmaa is concerned with the debilitating effects of postmodernity on the value and meaning of architectural environments. But as a theorist and architect who employs phenomenology, his perspective on such issues is predominantly experiential and psychological. Accordingly, Pallasmaa emphasizes the strangeness and alienation produced by many modern and postmodern developments including cultural homogenization on the promise of technologically mediated experiences and the establishment of economics and efficiency as the primary basis of value.

Regionalism, or regional practice, opens up possibilities available only on the "fringes" of consumer society (an echo of Frampton's use of "interstitial") (see Chapter 7) for the reconstruction of an architecture of meaning—an architecture that supports the cultural identity of those it serves. But it is also potentially a path to "sentimental provincialism" and chauvinism. This same fear led Kenneth Frampton, Alexander Tzonis, and Yannis Lefreres, via Critical Theory, to propose the strategy of "making strange" in which regional elements are employed but used in the promise of technologically mediated experiences and the establishment of economics and efficiency as the primary basis of value.

unconventionally in order to generate awareness, Pallasmaa's formulation would likely reject such a gesture as further alienating. In itself, perhaps only exacerbating the problem it meant to solve.

To this Pallasmaa proposes a second regional modernism, for which the primary problem is the loss of meaning and participation, not fear of eclecticism or the avant-gardist desire to represent emerging technologies. His argument for an experientially rich and culturally adapted architecture that integrates culture, the environment, symbolic meaning, and, by necessity, traditions, much as he did with his regional modernism, in summarizing his contribution in 2008, the author commented: "I wanted to point out the significance of tradition for architecture, and, in fact, for all creative work. During the 1980s, modernity was frequently accused of abandoning history and tradition; this argument was central in the post-modernist ideology. I intended to remind the reader that tradition and history are complex phenomena and they are strongly present in the dialectical process of questioning characteristic to the modern attitude."

Juhani Pallasmaa (c. 2008). From 1988, a view of the Faculty of Architecture at the Helsinki University of Technology.

Techno-Utopia and Identity

In his book Home Father the Swiss writer and playwright Max Frisch, an architect by training, portrays a Chinese expert, an engineer—symbol of Modern Man—who continuously travels around the world on his missions. He is a rational and realistic man whose life should be under perfect control. However, he slowly loses contact with locality and place, and finally with his own identity, so much so that he ends up falling in love with his own daughter whom he does not know as the tragic consequence of his loss of roots, the ultimate criticism of reality. Their love ends violently in the daughter's death. Home Father's great mistake was his conviction that with technology the world could be transformed so that it need not be experienced through emotions.

The Modern Movement unthinkingly aspired to create a universal culture. The new "technician for living in" set in "space, light, and greenery" went to emancipate their inhabitants from their bonds with the past, and to cultivate a New Universal Man.

Half a century later, however, the techno-rationally biased and economy-obsessed buildings that have become only too familiar everywhere inspire our sense of locality and identity. The standard building of today accelerates estrangement and alienation instead of integrating our world-view and sense of self. Simply, we have lost our faith in utopia.

Meanwhile, we have learned to admire unique and authentic forms of indigenous and vernacular traditions which were earlier hardly considered part of the realm of architecture. We admire the tangible integration of material and material conditions, patterns of life and forms of building in traditional societies.

Modern Man's mistake was his conviction that with technology the world could be transformed so that it need not be experienced through emotions. However, he slowly loses contact with locality and place, and finally with his own identity.

Culture is not composed of elements which can be dismantled and re-composed; culture has to be lived. Culture matures and endures slowly as they become based into the context and continuity of traditions. Culture is an entity of facts and beliefs, history and present material realities and mental conditions. It grows unconsciously and cannot be manipulated from outside. Hence, an authentic culturally differentiated architecture can only be born from differentiated patterns of culture, not from fashionable ideals in design. But do such conditions really exist in our time?

The profoundly Mexican architecture of Luis Barragán, for instance, reflects distinct deep-structure features of Mexican culture and life, particularly the presence of death as an accepted dimension of life, and turns these cultural ingredients into his unique metaphysical and surreal art, which is traditional and individual, timeless and radical at the same time.

The architecture of Álvaro Siza is an abstraction and condensation of social and building traditions of Oporto. His architecture is abstracted to the degree that one can hardly trace this tradition but its presence is felt in the authoritative quality of his architecture.

The regionalist architecture of Hungarian Imre Makovecz is more explicitly generated from images of Hungarian mythology and folklore and there is a feeling of cultural cartography in his work that suggests archaic times; one expects people to appear on the scene dressed in medieval tunics.

It seems that in our time regional identity is possible only on the fringes which have not been conquered by consumer society.

The Hidden Dimensions of Culture

As structural anthropology has taught us, the relations of man, artifacts, and culture are very complex. The difficulties of rationally describing these relations arise mainly because decisive interaction takes place on an unconscious biocultural level. These hidden dimensions have been brilliantly pointed out by Edward T. Hall, whose books on unconscious and culturally conditioned space

The diversity of building in traditional societies is brought about by the impact of local conditions and the specificity of culture. In our own culture the sheer force of industrial technology, combined with mobility, mass-communication, and uniformity of life-style, is causing cultural entropy that minimizes diversity. What is the feasibility of regional culture and architecture in a world in which two billion people gather simultaneously around TV sets to watch the same football match? Are we not gradually becoming detached from our foothold in geographic and cultural soil and going to live in a fictitious and fabricated culture, the culture of consumers that Umberto Eco has written about? Are we not moving towards a worldwide consumerist folklore, a mosaic of impacts and information detached from their origin. Isn't our culture doomed to lose all its authenticity and turn into a planetary waterworks show?

Diversification versus Unification

Beyond doubt, the gradual disappearance of a sense of locality and of human messages from our buildings is the result of cultural factors underlying the act of building—the values and ways of thinking and action that govern our civilization.

Is it possible to enter the realm of our culture? Is the reconstruction of regional architecture in postmodernist and Post-Modern society feasible? Indeed, can authentic architecture exist at all in the metaphysical materialism that we live in?

Clearly our identity, and mental well-being, cannot be supported by a universally standardized and abstracted oneness. Cultural anthropology has revealed that we do not live in separate physical and mental worlds. The two realms are totally fused and consequently the organization of our physical world is a projection of the mental one and vice versa.

An architecture capable of supporting our identity has to be situationally, culturally, and symbolically articulated. I am disenchanted by the notion of regionalism because of its geographic and ethnological connotations and would rather speak of situational or culture-specific architecture.
