Grafting/Characterization Techniques/Kinetic Modeling, 2007-10-13 Most of the untreated surfaces of polymers used in industry are not hydrophilic but hydrophobic It is therefore difficult to bond these nonpolar polymer surfaces directly to other substances like adhesives printing inks and paints because they generally consist of polar compounds On the other hand polymer surfaces generally adsorb proteins when brought into direct contact with a biological system resulting in cell attachment or platelet aggregation The protein adsorption and attachment of biological components trigger a subsequent series of mostly adverse biological reactions toward the polymeric materials Therefore the technologies for surface modification of polymers or regulation of the polymer surface interaction with other substances have been of prime importance in polymer applications from the advent of polymer industries Some of the technologies have been directed to introduction of new functionalities onto polymer surfaces The new functionalities introduced include improved surface hydrophilicity hydrophobicity biocompatibility conductivity anti fogging anti fouling grazing surface hardness surface roughness adhesion lubrication and antistatic property Theoretically there is a large difference in properties between the surface and the bulk of a material and only the outermost surface is enough to be taken into consideration when the surface properties are concerned However this is not the case for polymer surfaces as the physical structure of the outermost polymer surface is generally not fixed but continuously changing with time due to the microscopic Brownian motion of polymer segments
