

Compute Express Link™ 2.0 White Paper

Dr. Debendra Das Sharma, Intel Fellow and Director, I/O Technology and Standards, and Siamak Tavallaei, Principal Architect, Microsoft Azure Hardware Architecture Co-Chairs, Technical Task Force, CXL™ Consortium

Compute Express Link (CXL) is an open industry standard interconnect offering high-bandwidth, low-latency connectivity between host processor and devices such as accelerators, memory buffers, and smart I/O devices. It is designed to address the growing high-performance computational workloads by supporting heterogeneous processing and memory systems with applications in Artificial Intelligence, Machine Learning, Analytics, Cloud Infrastructure, Cloudification of the Network and Edge, communication systems, and High Performance Computing. It does this by enabling coherency and memory semantics on top of the PCI Express® (PCIe®) 5.0 based I/O semantics for optimized performance in evolving usage models. This is increasingly important as processing data in these emerging applications requires a diverse mix of scalar, vector, matrix and spatial architectures deployed in CPU, GPU, FPGA, smart NICs, and other accelerators.

CXL 1.0 debuted in March 2019 supporting dynamic multiplexing between a rich set of protocols that includes I/O (CXL.io, based on PCIe), caching (CXL.cache), and memory (CXL.memory) semantics. CXL maintains a unified, coherent memory space between the CPU (host processor) and any memory on the attached CXL device. This allows both the CPU and device to share resources and operate on the same memory region for higher performance, reduced data-movement, and reduced software stack complexity, resulting in three primary usages as demonstrated in Figure 1. Moreover, since the CPU is primarily responsible for coherency management, it can reduce device cost and complexity, as well as overhead traditionally associated with coherency across an I/O link. Introduced in July 2019, CXL 1.1 included the compliance testing details.
