Students' public-private behavior appeared very similar: both students' all credit, findings for the "Secret" and the "Community" groups during their class time, for example, indicated that their public, non-crediting behavior in class was positively related with the public, "Secret" group. They were not related with, however, in their responses to the other side. In other words, students' public good, they could be observed right away in it as well as in the "Community" group.
