The Practice of Persian Piano in Iran from 1879 to 1979 Maryam Farshadfar, 2017 Piano a western musical instrument has a unique historical position in Persian music Iran has its own music as part of its culture a classical canon with an enduring repertoire and characteristic techniques handed down from generation to generation with some improvements made along the way When the first keys were played on a piano in Tehran in the 1870s the members of the imperial court were the exclusive audience At the time Sorourolmolk the master musician of the Qajar palace during the reign of Nasereddin Shah Qajar 1848 1896 attempted to change the tuning of piano and play traditional Persian tunes in a way inspired by santur and tar techniques Thus the practice of piano in Iran was immediately associated with the music that had already existed for generations This would eventually become known as Persian piano Later the educated elite of the society and students of the first military music school in Tehran Sholeh Music Department were among the first practitioners of Persian piano This dissertation studies the art of Persian piano in Tehran from its introduction in 1880s until the Revolution of 1979 During this period Persian piano practice gradually matured culminating in the compositions and performances of Moshir Homayoun Shahrdad 1886 1969 Morteza Mahjoubi 1900 1965 and Javad Maroufi 1915 1993 Of this group Mahjoubi is considered the most prominent composer and performer and is the one credited with establishing Persian piano as a distinctive art form This study looks at his work and also focuses a spotlight on Maroufi's style and contributions to Persian piano With regard to the most notable elements in traditional Persian piano the dissertation offers a thorough analysis of the techniques and tuning systems linked to the Persian microtone and explores innovations in the canonic practice of traditional Persian piano With the rapid expansion of western classical music in Iran in the twentieth century the practice of Persian piano based almost entirely on indigenous Persian instrumental techniques forms and melodies no longer held an exclusive place in piano performance Accordingly the dissertation moves on to the practice of piano in Iran in the twentieth century and finds that Western classical piano co-existed with the Persian style The study delves into the establishment of the western classical piano in Persian society and presents the major contributors in this field including Emanuel Melik Aslanian 1915 2003 The dissertation places particular emphasis on female keyboard players their musical education style of play and public performances from the Qajar period through the Pahlavi era Today promising attempts to revitalize the art of Persian piano are on the rise This is especially true for Mahjoubi's style whose outstanding legacy marks a milestone in the evolution of Persian piano practice Presently Mahjoubi's best student Fakhri Malekpour is teaching the traditional style of Persian piano in private lessons in Tehran The effort to awaken interest and to train a new generation of practitioners just might mean that this unique form of
