

Diffusion is an important process that occurs in nature. It is the movement of particles from an area of high concentration to an area of low concentration. This process is essential for life. For example, oxygen and glucose move from the lungs and intestines into the bloodstream, and then into the cells. Waste products move from the cells into the bloodstream and then out of the body. Diffusion is also important for the movement of water and ions across cell membranes. In this activity, you will observe diffusion through a semi-permeable membrane.

Diffusion occurs across a semi-permeable membrane. A semi-permeable membrane allows some substances to pass through it, but not others. In this activity, you will use a dialysis bag as a semi-permeable membrane. The bag will allow small molecules to pass through it, but not large molecules. You will observe the movement of iodine and glucose through the bag.

Living cells are surrounded by a membrane that is made of a phospholipid bilayer. This membrane is semi-permeable, meaning it allows some substances to pass through it, but not others. The membrane is made of a phospholipid bilayer, which is a double layer of phospholipids. Each phospholipid has a hydrophilic head and a hydrophobic tail. The heads of the phospholipids face each other, and the tails face each other. This creates a barrier that is semi-permeable.

Some parts of the cell membrane are made of proteins. These proteins can act as channels or pumps. They allow some substances to pass through the membrane, but not others. This is called selective permeability. In this activity, you will observe the movement of iodine and glucose through a dialysis bag. The bag is made of a semi-permeable membrane.

1. The first part of the activity is to observe the movement of iodine and glucose through a dialysis bag.

1. Prepare the dialysis bag. Fill the bag with a solution of iodine and glucose. Seal the bag.
2. Prepare the beaker. Fill the beaker with a solution of water and glucose. Seal the beaker.
3. Observe the movement of iodine and glucose through the dialysis bag.

Observe the movement of iodine and glucose through the dialysis bag. The iodine will move from the bag into the beaker, and the glucose will move from the beaker into the bag. This is because the dialysis bag is semi-permeable. It allows small molecules like iodine to pass through it, but not large molecules like glucose. This is called selective permeability. In this activity, you will observe the movement of iodine and glucose through a dialysis bag. The bag is made of a semi-permeable membrane.
