Architectures for Accelerated Computation Beyond the Von Neumann Hardware Richard Afoakwa, 2021 The von Neumann model of computing systems has pioneered modern computer architecture and driven general purpose computing in the last 75 years Over the years architects have leveraged Moore's law and Denard's scaling to provide micro architectural techniques for incredible performance gains But these factors have slowed over the last decade Due to the ever changing complexity and scale of problem sets that a computational system is required to solve architects need fresh inspiration for overall system performance improvements with specific focus on energy efficiency One such approach lies in the ability to accelerate data movement and perhaps to entirely re think the von Neumann model for a more specialized accelerated computation The first section of this work explores interconnect based approaches to efficiently accelerate data movement by utilizing near speed of light communication substrate Due to smaller faster and energy efficient transistor devices it is possible to architect energy efficient high speed circuitry as the backbone of intra and inter chip communication Such a system is composed of carefully designed high speed transceiver circuitry and supporting transmission line fabric Compared to conventional repeated wires high speed communication offers low latency low energy as well as high throughput Firstly I explore an approach to increase link bandwidth through multi bit transmission by pulse amplitude modulation PAM I show that by using higher swing voltage it is possible to architect such multi bit transmission The high speed circuitry can be effectively adapted to transmission distance thereby more judiciously expending energy Additionally I propose utilizing the optimizations mentioned above for 2.5D system architecture I show that state of the art PAM signaling coupled with dense interposer based links can effectively produce similar performance benefits to a fully integrated 3D system With the added benefits of higher energy efficiency In the second part of this work I explore a non von Neumann approach to accelerated computing There exist large classes of problems that cannot be mapped to a conventional von Neumann machine For example combinatorial optimizing problems Therefore I explore CMOS compatible Ising machines to provide a means of specialized accelerated computation Abstract problems can be mapped on such a hardware and physics naturally guides the dynamics to an optimal solution The idea for Ising machines have been explored in the physics domain over the years But the architecture of such a hardware is yet to be fully exploited in a conventional CMOS system Recently physicists have proposed quantum optical and oscillatory approaches as a means of architecting Ising machines I propose the architecture of chip scale integrated circuit based designs for more immediate applications Our design utilizes bistable resistively coupled networks And I show that such an Ising machine outperforms current approaches in all metrics speed area energy and quality of solution Pages vii viii
