Abstract: In this research, two technologies were being used with a group of first-year students. It is argued that the implementation of novel technology, information and technology and applying this knowledge in various contexts could be a solution to various learning problems. Furthermore, the authors have been working with a group of students who are using the technology in their learning and teaching.

It is interesting to note that every highlighted segment had three parts: (a) trying to capture the essential (core) contents of the article, and (b) the knowledge boundary. These two parts represented the knowledge state of the learner before the segment. The third part, the highlighted segment, represented the knowledge state of the learner after the segment. In the past, researchers in the cognitive field have examined the changes in knowledge boundaries, but have not examined the changes in the knowledge state of the learner before the knowledge boundary.
