

Clinical Tester

A young couple is seen for a routine midgestational (week twenty) ultrasound during their first pregnancy. The ultrasonographer is showing the couple their child, a boy, when she pauses. After a couple of minutes, she says that there may be "abnormalities," so she will ask the doctor to take a look. After reviewing the scans, the perinatologist (an obstetric subspecialist who provides care for mother and fetus in higher-risk pregnancies) comes in and explains that the fetus has oligohydramnios (too little amniotic fluid), hydronephrosis (dilated ureters and kidneys), and mega-cystis (dilated bladder). She states her suspicion that the boy has bladder outlet obstruction due to a condition called posterior urethral valves. She tells them this is an abnormality of the urethra that prevents normal urine excretion and causes the urine to back up into bladder, ureters, and kidneys. She says that this backup can damage the kidneys, and the lack of amniotic fluid can prevent the lungs from developing normally. She says that if left untreated, the child will develop a condition called Potter sequence. The parents are warned that if nothing is done, the child will die at the time of birth as the result of respiratory failure.

An amniocentesis is performed for subsequent chromosome analysis, which shows a normal 46,XY karyotype, and in a second ultrasound, no other structural abnormalities are found. The couple is referred to a center with expertise in fetal surgery for correcting posterior urethral valves. After weighing the risks of surgery against the likelihood of postnatal death from pulmonary hypoplasia, the couple elects to undergo placement of a vesicoamniotic catheter (which shunts urine from the bladder to the amniotic cavity) at twenty-two weeks of gestation. The procedure goes well, and a follow-up ultrasound shows decompression of the bladder and urinary collecting system. The pregnancy is followed closely for signs of shunt malfunction, infection, amniotic fluid leakage, and preterm labor. The boy is delivered at thirty-six weeks of gestation, and surgery is done to create a vesicostomy (opening from the bladder to the abdominal wall), with urinary reconstructive surgery planned in the future.

Potter sequence can have multiple causes. Other clinical scenarios that result in this sequence are given in the "Embryology in Practice" and "Clinical Tester" for Chapter 15.

DURING FETAL PERIOD, EMBRYONIC ORGAN SYSTEMS MATURE AND FETUS GROWS

The preceding chapters have focused on the embryonic period, the period during which the organs and systems of the body are formed (Fig. 6-1A). The succeeding fetal period, from eight weeks to birth at about thirty-eight weeks, is devoted to the maturation of these organ systems and to growth (Fig. 6-1B; Table 6-1). The fetus grows from 14 g at the beginning of the fetal period (end of the second month) to about 3500 g at birth—a two-hundred-and-fifty-fold increase. Most of this weight is added in the third trimester (seven to nine months), although the fetus grows in length mainly in the second trimester (four to six months). The growth of the fetus is accompanied by drastic changes in proportion: at nine weeks, the head of the fetus represents about half its crown-rump length (the "sitting height" of the fetus), whereas at birth, it represents about one fourth of the crown-rump length.

Although all organ systems are present by eight weeks, few of them are functional. The most prominent exceptions are the heart and blood vessels, which begin to circulate blood during the fourth week. Even so, the reconfiguration of the fetal circulatory system, covered in Chapter 13, is not complete until three months. The sensory systems also lag. For example, the auditory ossicles are not free to vibrate until just before birth, and although the neural retina of the eye differentiates during the third and fourth months, the eyelids remain closed until five to seven months, and the eyes cannot focus properly until several weeks after birth.

A number of organs do not finish maturing until after birth. The most obvious example is the reproductive system and associated sexual characteristics, which, as in most animals, do not finish developing until the
