INTRODUCTION

Nurses constitute the greatest number of healthcare workers in the United States (US) and globally.^[1] Increasingly, the role they play in meeting societal demands for safe, evidence-informed, quality care is being recognized.^[2-4] Moreover, more evidence is being generated that supports the nurse's level of education makes a significant impact on patient outcomes.^[4-6] These investigators report that patient mortality decreases when the number of nurses prepared at the baccalaureate level increased. However, Felber et al., report contrary results when non-US educated nurses are employed in US hospitals except in instances when 'patient-to-nurse ratios are lower than average' (p. 366).^[4] Thus education may not be the only factor contributing to patient outcomes.

Nonetheless, despite increasing evidence, debate about what constitutes the most appropriate education for nurses continues in the US and elsewhere. In many countries, nurses continue to be educated by physicians, programmes of study are extremely short, and opportunities for continuing education are limited. In the US, an individual can choose one of three programmes for their initial education in nursing: Hospital-based, community college or 4-year college or university. The purposes of this article are to provide a brief overview of the evolution of nursing education, describe the current and projected state of nursing education, and discuss some pressing challenges that educators face as they strive to meet the charge to prepare nurses to care for more complex patients situated in ever-changing healthcare systems.

EVOLUTION OF NURSING EDUCATION

The past

Donahue^[78] in her illustrated history of nursing from ancient times, highlights times when the profession of nursing was either present or noticeably absent. While beyond the scope of this article, one must be cognizant of the impact societal changes have had on nursing education is critical to the discussion. Thus, issues such as disease, revolutions, and women's rights have helped drive the need for and education of nurses.

Although there are records of men and women nurses during early civilisations, most scholars consider the work done by Florence Nightingale connotes the birth of modern nursing. Her efforts had a profound impact on standards of nursing care^[11-12] and on the education

Midwifery in China Ngai Fen Cheung, Rosemary Mander, 2018-06-27 The first book to present the history ideas life and works of Chinese midwives and birth attendants this volume seeks to encapsulate and explain the changing ideas about the practice of midwifery in China Using participant observations and interviews it examines each phase of the development of midwifery in depth Providing a systematic study of the existing literature and contemporary national health policies it analyses the factors contributing to the current demise of midwifery in China such as the absence of national regulation high standards of education and national midwives associations Furthermore it argues that China's national statistics in the past six decades demonstrate clear evidence that minimising maternal mortality rates will only happen through wider availability of services rather than through obstetric technology or facility based care Ultimately therefore this book supports the view that humanity and midwifery will survive to overcome domination by both technology and market forces and that economic growth and medical technology alone will not be sufficient in providing effective healthcare This book is an indispensable resource for the study of Chinese midwifery both in theory and in practice As such it will be useful to students and scholars of Midwifery Women's Health Sociology and culture and society in China
