Mastering the Essential Building Blocks of All Writing

In the summer of 1968, after graduating from Macalester, Tim O'Brien came home to find a draft notice in his mail. A student leader, O'Brien had demonstrated against the Vietnam War and worked for Eugene McCarthy's presidential campaign. He was torn over whether to report for military service or flee to Canada. All summer O'Brien worked in a pig factory in Minnesota, where he saw grapefruit-sized clots of blood from the carcasses that passed on a conveyor line overhead.

As the date of his military induction approached, O'Brien and his friend drove north, stopping just south of the Canadian border. They put him up in a cottage for six days. One day the two went out to fish. As they sat with their lines in the water, O'Brien realized he would leap out and swim to Canada. But at that moment, he decided to stay for military duty. He started crying—not because of a fear of war, but because he realized that he was too cowardly not to fight a war.
