Background

Ascites is defined as an abnormal accumulation of fluid in the abdominal cavity. It is the most common complication of cirrhosis, with approximately 50% of persons with compensated cirrhosis developing ascites over the course of 10 years. After developing ascites that necessitates hospitalization, the risk of mortality increases to 15% at 1 year and nearly 50% at 5 years. Complications following the development of ascites include spontaneous bacterial peritonitis, dilutional hyponatremia, refractory ascites, hepatic hydrothorax, and hepatorenal syndrome. Development of these complications markedly decreases the likelihood of survival (Figure 1).[\[1,2\]](#) The development of ascites should prompt an immediate referral for consideration of liver transplantation.
