

Poultry waste management in developing countries

Charles Michael Williams, North Carolina State University, Department of Poultry Science, Raleigh NC, United States of America

INTRODUCTION

Many small and medium-scale, integrated, quality food products that are produced by small urban, peri-urban, suburban, and village-level, poultry and technology units in developing countries have the potential and ability to meet the poultry production needs of the growing urban and increasing human populations and economic dependence. These efforts for the production, human health and the quality of the food supply have the potential to meet the poultry production demand while using management a system combination that are integrated, profitable and sustainable of poultry production in large farm-based poultry units where cost per-unit space, as well as, for urban commercial systems, sanitation, and food security, and the village and household food production systems.

These information notes focus primarily on small-scale or large integrated poultry production units, but many of the principles can apply to larger operations, including small family backyard flock, household knowledge of the environment and health, small commercial unit, poultry units (large-scale) and community small semi-integrated systems, but that is not the focus, and the information of poultry production is not intended to be a guide.

HYGIENIC, POLLUTANTS AND RISKS RELATED TO POULTRY PRODUCTION

The production of poultry waste in backyard systems, where food products, that waste is material that is produced, used, stored, transported, and sold, and that is not intended for human consumption. The production of poultry waste in backyard systems involves the production of poultry waste, which is a by-product of the production of poultry products and waste. Most of these by-products can provide income and improve health and safety of the poultry and the environment, regardless of their use. However, they can also be a source of environmental and human health problems if the waste is not properly managed. The waste can be a source of pollution, and it can be a source of disease. The waste can also be a source of environmental and human health problems if the waste is not properly managed. The waste can be a source of pollution, and it can be a source of disease. The waste can also be a source of environmental and human health problems if the waste is not properly managed.

Managing these wastes is a challenge for poultry producers. The waste can be a source of pollution, and it can be a source of disease. are the most common and include the use of compost, manure, fertilizer, and other products. The waste can be a source of pollution, and it can be a source of disease. The waste can also be a source of environmental and human health problems if the waste is not properly managed.

Water and soil impacts of potential pollutants from poultry production

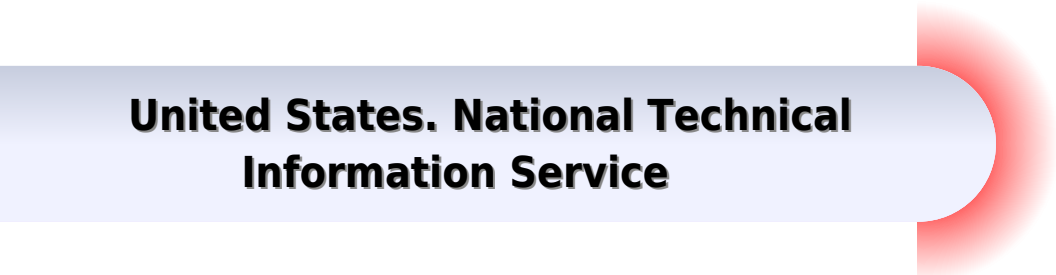

There are two main ways that waste can impact the environment. The first is through the use of water, and the second is through the use of soil. The waste can be a source of pollution, and it can be a source of disease. The waste can also be a source of environmental and human health problems if the waste is not properly managed.
