

From the Journal of a Disappointed Man

SUMMARY

I came across a crew of men installing a new support column on the dock. They had all the relevant equipment: chains, pulleys, cranes, cables, and of course, the wooden support column, which was huge, swaying above the waves on a long wire cable. Everything else on this scene was huge, too, including the crewmen: very strong, thoughtful, quiet men, who paid no attention to me.

They weren't interested in talking, and when they did speak, it was in one-syllable words: "Let go," "Hold tight," and so on. Still, by keenly observing the strange movements of a crewman working on a dockside ladder, I realized that despite their skill and physical power, the crew members were struggling with a major challenge.

I don't know what it was. These huge men stayed quiet about it. At first, I thought they were bewildered, but then I figured out that they were apathetic, exhausted, and sick of the job.

The crewman closest to me, remaining silent but folding his big arms, made it clear that he didn't care if the column dangled in midair till doomsday.

To be fair, I observed them for over an hour, and they did patiently keep trying to solve the mysterious issue—until their efforts slowed and eventually stopped.

One by one, the huge crewmen left their places and leaned on the pier's metal railing, staring meditatively at the water. None of them said anything or described what they were seeing. But one guy spat and, watching intently, tracked his brown wad of chewing tobacco as it sank into the deep.

The crew foreman, who was the most creative problem-solver, took a smoke break to calm everyone's nerves. Then, with a sort of grave and imposing dignity, he turned around and walked off the job.

His indifference brought the scene to an abrupt end. First singly, then in pairs, then as a group, the other guys walked away, too. All that remained was the column—still dangling in the air—and, naturally, me.

column) into a "pier," the speaker realizes that the workmen have encountered a mysterious problem they cannot solve. They finally walk away, and the poem remains as unresolved as the workmen's "difficulty"; it provides no satisfying answers or explanations. In this way, the poem illustrates what deep disappointment looks and feels like. Life can be just like that; the poem seems to say: it can leave people completely at a loss, frustrated as if suspended "in mid-air."

The events of the poem are a study in frustration and failure. The speaker describes a scene in which construction workers can't fix some issue that's never made clear. Their uncertainty turns into "tension," which mounts until they finally give up. Their experience is frustrating in a different way for the speaker and the reader: we aren't responsible for the problem, but we have no understanding or control over it.

Meanwhile, the workmen's struggle to overcome their "great difficulty" seems to hold a mirror to the speaker's own life. The speaker is presented as "Disappointed" for unknown reasons, even before he watches the construction crew. As he observes the crew at great length ("at least an hour") and in great detail, his fascination suggests an emotional or psychological investment in their struggle. It's as though he'll feel successful if he sees them succeed, like a failure if he doesn't. Ultimately, he realizes that the men are not "baffled" by their difficult task but "indifferent / and tired of the whole business." They're experiencing a kind of ennui, and perhaps would rather be elsewhere, doing something more fulfilling. They, too, are "Disappointed" in their work and lives.

The poem never alleviates these feelings of disappointment and failure—never wraps them into a satisfying conclusion or lesson. Instead, it forces the reader to accept them, as if to say, "That's life." Indeed, the poem goes out of its way to "disappoint" the reader and "fail" as a narrative. In the end, its anecdote, like the "pile" itself, seems to dangle awkwardly "in mid-air."

The speaker, too, is left hanging: he's spent over an hour quietly rooting for the workmen, only to watch them give up. He never gets the satisfying ending he was presumably hoping for, and neither does the reader. Yet the final words of the poem, "of course," hint that this outcome was inevitable. Disappointment, the speaker seems to suggest, is the story of his life—and a fact of life in general.
