House, 1984 This study attempts to trace the development of combined arms concepts organization and practices by an examination of five major powers Great Britain Germany France the United States and the Soviet Union The focus is on developments at and below division level and as such this survey provides valuable background information for the process of force and doctrinal design Prior to 1914 the combat arms were integrated within divisions of most armies Yet each of the arms existed in small units equipped with only one type of weapon and having only limited interaction with the other arms Most professional soldiers were aware of developments in the firepower of infantry and artillery weapons but it required the reality of World War I to establish the absolute necessity for infantry artillery cooperation in all tactical operations World War I not only witnessed the growth of modern indirect fire techniques and infantry organizations but also forced armies to develop elaborate command control and communications systems to orchestrate the various arms on a complex battlefield Between the two World wars major armies evolved in different directions despite their common recognition of tactical issues such as mechanization and air support All nations developed new tactics and equipment to some degree but only Germany synchronized its developments in materiel doctrine and training so that it had a temporary advantage in mechanized warfare during the period 1933-41. World War II produced a number of major trends. For example, most armies adjusted their armored formations from an extremely tank-heavy structure towards a relatively balanced combination of infantry, armor, antitank, and artillery elements. Different nations tried different solutions to the problem of task organizing at the small unit and division level and all experienced difficulties in coordinating close air support. Since 1945, both the Soviet Union and the United States have had to adjust to major challenges posed to mechanized combined arms by the rise of nuclear weapons and of low intensity warfare. At the same time, the Israeli armed forces have followed the same pattern of combined arms use and neglect that Germany covered from 1916 to 1945. In addition to a variety of lesser points about the functions of various arms, this thesis focuses on three major themes: the necessity for combined arms integration at small unit level; the difficulties of achieving such integration by attaching non-divisional units on a temporary basis; and the continuing difficulties in reconciling ground and air force priorities in order to ensure effective close air support.

Towards Combined Arms Warfare Jonathan M. House, ARMY COMMAND AND GENERAL STAFF COLLEGE FORT LEAVENWORTH KS., 1984. This thesis traces the development of combined arms concepts and organization by examining Great Britain, Germany, France, the US, and the USSR. It focuses on developments at and below division level and provides information for the process of force and doctrinal design. Before 1914, the combat arms were integrated within the divisions of most armies. Each existed in small units equipped with one type of weapon and having limited interaction with the other arms. World War I not only witnessed the growth of modern indirect fire techniques and infantry organizations but also forced armies to develop elaborate command control and communications systems to orchestrate the various arms on a battlefield. Germany synchronized its developments in materiel, doctrine, and training so that it had a temporary advantage in mechanized warfare during the period 1939-41. Most armies adjusted their armored formations from a tank-heavy structure towards a relatively balanced combination of infantry, armor, antitank, and artillery elements. They tried solutions to the problem of task organizing at the small unit and division level and experienced difficulties in coordinating close air support. The USSR and the US have had to adjust to challenges posed to mechanized combined arms by the rise of nuclear weapons and of low intensity warfare. The themes of this thesis are the necessity for combined arms integration at small unit level; the difficulties of achieving such integration by attaching non-divisional units on a temporary basis; and the continuing difficulties in reconciling ground and air force priorities in order to ensure effective close air support. author
