Dialectical Behavior Therapy Adapted for Suicidal and Multiproblem Adolescents John Jacob Loeffler, 2016. Dialectical behavior therapy (DBT) is a comprehensive treatment that is effective for rehabilitating chronically suicidal adults. Given that suicidal and self-injurious behaviors are also a significant public health concern for adolescents, there is a need for a therapy to effectively treat these behaviors. To fulfill this treatment need, clinicians adapted the structure and content of DBT to provide a developmentally appropriate treatment for adolescents. Presently, a number of empirical studies support the efficacy of DBT for adolescents with suicidal behaviors as well as other psychiatric conditions. In light of the growing literature base for DBT, it is important to review the theoretical rationale and empirical support for this adaptation of DBT. Thus, this paper reviews DBT's philosophical underpinnings and treatment principles for suicidal adults, research, and the theoretical and program adaptations of DBT. A. Last, this paper reviews the literature on DBT for suicidal and multiproblem adolescents with a concentration on the limitations, future directions, and clinical applications.
