

Diseases of farmed crocodiles and ostriches

F.W. Huchzermeyer

P.O. Box 12499, 0110 Onderstepoort, South Africa

Summary

Crocodiles and ostriches are very sensitive to stress, and the ideal conditions for intensive rearing have not yet been established. Consequently, mortality is often directly linked to conditions on the farm. Crocodile and caiman pox, adenoviral hepatitis, mycoplasmosis, chlamydiosis and coccidiosis are crocodile-specific infections with reservoirs in wild populations and adult wild-caught breeding stock. Other important conditions are salmonellosis, non-specific septicaemia, trichinellosis, the nutritional diseases osteomalacia, fat necrosis and gout, as well as winter sores.

The only ostrich-specific transmissible disease is libyostrongylosis. Other important conditions are Newcastle disease, avian influenza, fading chick syndrome, tibiotarsal rotation and enteritis. No cases of coccidiosis in ostriches have ever been confirmed.

Introduction

Commercial ostrich farming began approximately 150 years ago, initially for the feathers only, much later for the leather as well and only relatively recently for the meat. Recent years have seen a world-wide expansion of ostrich production. As a result of a long history of domestication, farmed ostriches are classified as domestic stock in South Africa. In comparison, the commercial production of crocodiles for skins and meat originated much more recently. If based on the collection of eggs or hatchlings from the wild, with the release of a certain percentage of grown stock back into the wild, the production is referred to as 'ranching', whereas the production from captive breeding stock is termed 'farming'. This distinction does not apply to the title or text of this paper, and in this paper the term 'crocodiles' includes all crocodilian species, including caimans and alligators.

There are no ostrich-specific infectious or contagious diseases, the only specific pathogen being Libyostongylus, the wireworm. A few crocodile-specific infectious agents exist, but none of these could be regarded as a primary pathogen. However, ostriches and crocodiles share an extreme sensitivity to stress, which under the widely practised intensive rearing conditions can trigger disastrous outbreaks of disease and mortality.

Crocodiles

Thermoregulation and stress

Although poikilotherms, crocodiles like to maintain body temperature within a narrow range of 28°C–33°C by using the thermogradient in their natural environment consisting of sunshine and shade, warm surface and cold deep water, as well as burrows. Inability to thermoregulate or exposure to low or fluctuating temperatures and particularly to overheating are common sources of stress in farming situations. For these tropical animals, body temperatures above 36°C are lethal, while lowered body temperatures very severely reduce the activity of the immune system.

Hatchlings and juvenile crocodiles also fear exposure to the open sky; even indoors, the animals like to hide, and for this purpose hide boards should be provided (Fig. 1). Inability to hide, handling, capture and any sudden noise or movement in the environment are further common sources of stress.

Sources and reservoirs of infection

Crocodile-specific infectious agents are carried and shed by wild crocodiles and can contaminate crocodile inhabited waters, such as rivers or lakes, from which water often is drawn

A Checklist of Host-Parasite Interactions of the Order Crocodylia Marisa Tellez, 2013-08-17 Records of parasitism in crocodilians date back to the early 1800s distributed among published and unpublished manuscripts and international parasite catalogs It is possible that parasites of crocodilians are highly host specific resulting in a relationship that began over 200 million years ago Analyzing parasite host specificity geographic distribution and taxonomy can provide otherwise cryptic details about crocodilian ecology and evolution as well as their local food web dynamics This information may also be useful to implement improved conservation tactics for both crocodilians and their habitat As climate change anthropogenic conflict and environmental pollution endanger crocodilian ecosystems there is a need for organized information on crocodile alligator caiman and gharial infectious diseases This is the first checklist of crocodilians and their parasites I trust this compilation will encourage further studies that incorporate ecology parasitology phylogeography coevolution and immunology to bring insight to crocodilian life history evolution and conservation Additionally this information may encourage veterinarians biologists and ecologists to expand studies of other reptilian parasite systems and perhaps improve our understanding of human impacts on ecosystems Page xi
