

Test 3

1. The aggregate demand curve:

- A. is upsloping because a higher price level is necessary to make production profitable as production costs rise.
- B. is downsloping because production costs decline as real output increases.
- C. shows the amount of expenditures required to induce the production of each possible level of real output.
- D. shows the amount of real output that will be purchased at each possible price level.

2. The interest-rate effect suggests that:

- A. a decrease in the supply of money will increase interest rates and reduce interest-sensitive consumption and investment spending.
- B. an increase in the price level will increase the demand for money, reduce interest rates, and decrease consumption and investment spending.
- C. an increase in the price level will increase the demand for money, increase interest rates, and decrease consumption and investment spending.
- D. an increase in the price level will decrease the demand for money, reduce interest rates, and increase consumption and investment spending.

3. If the price level increases in the United States relative to foreign countries, then American consumers will purchase more foreign goods and fewer U.S. goods. This statement describes:

- A. the output effect.
- B. the foreign purchases effect.
- C. the real-balances effect.
- D. the shift-of-spending effect.

4. Which of the following is incorrect?

- A. As the U.S. price level rises, U.S. goods become relatively more expensive so that U.S. exports fall and U.S. imports rise.
- B. As the price level falls, the demand for money declines, the interest rate declines, and interest-rate sensitive spending increases.
- C. When the price level increases, real balances increase, businesses and households find themselves wealthier and therefore increase their spending.
- D. Given aggregate demand, an increase in aggregate supply increases real output and, assuming downward flexible prices, reduces the price level.
