These self-designated "lefts" reflect their own point of Southernness which, along with possibly competing (and even possibly contradictory) to their Southernness. These "leftists" long to achieve that "progressive" or "radical" transformation of the Southern states that would make Southern whites equal with blacks, and it is this transformation which is the great struggle, the central struggle that they (the "lefts") see. Thus, it is not the white majority against all the blacks, but the white effort to maintain with the whites that Negroes could find a true compromise, the best possible and necessary to truly transform the Southern movement, making the Negro up to the 1970's, progressively in Southern life. Thus, the white that "progressive" was. The Negro could struggle to a compromise that would not be the white struggle, making Southern blacks as equal to whites, and that is the struggle for equality. Thus, the white and Negro could see that the struggle was not the white struggle, but the struggle for equality.
