

AUDIT SAMPLING FOR TESTS OF CONTROLS AND SUBSTANTIVE TESTS OF TRANSACTIONS

If You Are Not Going To Believe It, Don't Use It

Brooks & Company, CPAs, uses random samples when performing audit tests whenever possible. They believe that this gives them the best chance of getting representative samples of their clients' accounting information. In the audit of Sensational Products, a random sample of 30 inventory items was taken from a population of 1,800 items for testing unit and total costs. Only 1 of the 30 items was in error, but it was large. In investigating the error, Harold Davis, the audit staff person doing the test, was told by Sensational's controller that the error occurred while the regular inventory clerk was on vacation and was really only an "isolated error."

Harold knew auditing standards require errors in random samples to be projected to the entire population. He did this by projecting the error by multiplying the error found by a factor of 60 (1,800 divided by 30). This would result in an audit adjustment or additional audit work. Harold knew that the client would not be happy about this because the adjustment would reduce an already "strained" net income figure and additional auditing would increase the audit fee. If the error was, in fact, an isolated one, it would not be significant enough to require an audit adjustment.

Harold decided to look at the situation in terms of the probability of the error being an isolated occurrence. He calculated the odds to be about 1 in 60 for a sample of 30 from a population of 1,800 to include an isolated error. He then looked at accepting the client's representation about the uniqueness of the error as a bet. If he accepted the representation and didn't do the projection and act on it, he was in effect betting his career on a situation where the odds were 60 to 1 against him. It didn't take Harold long to recognize the wisdom of the professional standards and conclude that the projection should be done.
