Moreover, a team leader must take care managing team relationships carefully because there may be a high level of conflict in these teams due to unit rivalry, ego, and possible conflict between the various parts of the organisation represented by team members. For example, the engineers in operations may be keen to purchase the latest piece of technology while the accountants on the team probably wish to minimise costs – conflicting interests need to be managed carefully.
Democratic leadership style	20	A leadership style where: - Participation is encouraged - Two-way communication is used, which allows feedback from staff - Employees are given information about the business to allow full staff involvement	A likely question that may be asked is to distinguish between the two leadership styles. No evaluation is required here, just clear definitions, examples and application to the staff will be enough for full marks. If this is the focus of the question, then the IB, and SL papers in particular, will expect you to evaluate the strengths and weaknesses of two leadership styles in the context of RDM's situation. It is worth noting that while democratic leadership is a positive style, it is not always the best style for all situations. For example, a manager who is democratic may not get the best results from a team that is not self-motivated. In such a situation, a more autocratic style may be more effective. This is because autocratic leadership is only suited to the right-hand side of the leadership continuum. McGregor's (1960) Theory X and Theory Y (also known as McGregor's Theory of Motivation) provide a useful framework for evaluating leadership styles. Theory X assumes that people are inherently lazy and need to be controlled, while Theory Y assumes that people are inherently motivated and need to be encouraged. McGregor's Theory X is more suited to the right-hand side of the leadership continuum, while Theory Y is more suited to the left-hand side. McGregor's Theory X and Theory Y are also known as McGregor's Theory of Motivation. Theory X assumes that people are inherently lazy and need to be controlled, while Theory Y assumes that people are inherently motivated and need to be encouraged. McGregor's Theory X is more suited to the right-hand side of the leadership continuum, while Theory Y is more suited to the left-hand side. - Self-actualisation: Reaching one's full potential e.g. challenging work that stretches the individual – this will give a sense of achievement. Opportunities to develop and apply new skills will increase potential. - Team needs: Respect from others, status and recognition of achievement. One
Participative leadership style	20	A leadership approach that involves a dominant authority figure who consults a partner or team on key decisions. This style is often used in situations where the leader has a high level of expertise and the team has a high level of motivation.
