

Diatom Identification Key

Glossary

Valve: Diatom cells include an outer, siliceous cell wall which is composed of two parts, or valves. Many of the features used to classify diatoms are based on the morphology of the valves. Each valve has a face and a mantle.

Raphe: A slit through the valve face of monosulcate and diaphragm diatoms, usually situated along the apical axis. This is the structure which enables a diatom cell to move over substrates. A raphe is without raphe.

Frontal: Siliceous portion of diatom cell, a consisting of two valves, an apical valve and hypovalve and their associated diaphragm elements.

Heterosulcate: Frontal valve in which one valve differs in morphology from the other. Used next to refer to the monosulcate diatoms, where one valve possesses a raphe and the other possesses a pseudoraphe.

Isosulcate: Frontal valve in which both valves bear an equal and fully formed raphe.
